When I first moved into Mitchel Street Children's Home at 7 Mitchell Street in Airdrie, I was still young enough to believe that adults in charge were supposed to protect me. Instead, I found myself in an environment where I felt constantly afraid. Staff would shout names at me for no reason, as if humiliating me was part of their daily routine. There were times when they grabbed me, held me down, and hit me on the back of the head. I remember feeling confused, wondering what I had done wrong, even though deep down I knew I hadn't done anything to deserve it. The place that was supposed to keep me safe became somewhere I felt trapped.

Not long after, I was moved to Newfield Assessment Centre in Johnstone. I was only twelve years old, and I stayed there for just a few weeks, but those weeks left a lasting mark on me. They would keep me in an empty room all day, refusing to let me out until school had finished for the other residents. I could hear life happening outside the door, but I wasn't allowed to be part of it. When staff came in, it wasn't to check on me with kindness. They would grab me, hold me down, and throw me around the room as if I were an object instead of a child. I remember feeling powerless, like my voice didn't matter and my body wasn't my own. I didn't understand why adults who were supposed to care for me treated me with such cruelty.

Later, I was sent to Snowdon School at 31 Spittal Street in Stirling. I hoped things might be different there, but the same patterns repeated themselves. Male staff would grab me, throw me around, and restrain me with force even when I hadn't done anything wrong. They acted as though I was a problem to be controlled rather than a young person who needed support. Sometimes they would leave me alone in a room for hours, shutting me away as if isolating me was a solution. They shouted names at me, trying to provoke reactions that they could then use as justification for their behaviour. I remember sitting alone in those rooms, wondering why no one seemed to care about how I felt or what I was going through.

Looking back, what hurts the most isn't just the physical force they used but the way they made me feel invisible. I was a child who needed understanding, patience, and safety, but instead I was met with hostility and neglect. These experiences stayed with me, shaping the way I saw myself and the world around me. No child should ever be treated the way I was, and speaking about it now is part of reclaiming my voice. Even though those places failed me, I'm learning that what happened wasn't my fault, and I deserved far better than the way I was treated.
