My time in this home was marked by constant suffering, and the memories of what happened there have remained with me ever since. There was relentless bullying, and the daily conditions we were subjected to were harsh and deeply uncomfortable. We were made to stand in the freezing cold and forced to take cold showers. We were made to walk miles to attend church, and we were taken on long walks up massive hills, regardless of whether we were able to manage it. These things were not occasional occurrences — they were a constant part of life in that place.

One of the most painful things I experienced was being denied contact with my father. He came to visit us and brought us new shoes, which meant a great deal. However, the staff took the shoes and refused to let us see him. We were only permitted to wear the shoes during the day, as though even that small gift from him had to be controlled. My father and I were very close, and being kept from him was devastating. He and my mother had separated, which meant that the time we did have with him was already limited. Having that contact deliberately cut off by the staff was something I found incredibly distressing. To this day I have nightmares about it, and those dreams still make me cry. The pain of being kept from someone I loved so much is not something that has ever left me.

We were made to feed animals as part of our routine, despite the fact that I have always been deeply scared of animals. This fear has stayed with me throughout my life. Dogs coming near me still frightens me, and guinea pigs in particular remain a vivid and uncomfortable memory from that time. Having a known fear dismissed and ignored in that way was yet another example of how little regard the staff had for our wellbeing.

When it came to food, we were given no choice and no voice. If we did not eat what was put in front of us, we were given nothing at all. We were also made to carry out chores that should have been the responsibility of the staff themselves — sweeping floors, washing dishes, and other domestic tasks that we were expected to complete as a matter of routine.

The physical treatment we received was violent and completely unacceptable. We were smacked across our arms, legs, heads, and hands. If we were not walking quickly enough, or if we took too long to complete a task, we would be struck. I was bruised on a number of occasions as a result. I was also made to sit at the table and was not permitted to move, and there were times when we were physically restrained. To be treated with that level of physical force as a child, by adults who were supposed to be caring for us, was frightening and deeply wrong.

I was in the home alongside my sisters, and while being together provided some small degree of comfort in an otherwise very difficult situation, the staff actively tried to separate us. The bond I had with my sisters was one of the few sources of support I had, and the attempts to undermine that felt cruel and deliberate.

Everything I experienced in that home has had a lasting effect on me. The fear, the physical pain, the isolation from my father, and the constant sense of being controlled and punished have all shaped who I am and how I experience the world. These are not things I have simply moved on from. They are things I carry with me every day, and I feel it is important that they are now fully heard and acknowledged.
