When I moved into Ladyfield, I had already been through more than most people ever see, but nothing prepared me for the eighteen months that followed. I was hoping for stability, maybe even a chance to heal from what I had already experienced. Instead, Ladyfield became another place where I felt unsafe, unheard, and constantly on edge. The abuse there wasn't just physical—it was mental, emotional, and relentless.

From the beginning, the staff made it clear that they held all the power. They spoke to us in ways that chipped away at our confidence, calling us horrible names and treating us like we were less than human. It wasn't discipline; it was cruelty disguised as authority. When they were angry, or even when they simply felt like it, they would become physically aggressive. Being handled roughly became a normal part of daily life. If you reacted, even out of fear, they would restrain you with a level of force that made it hard to breathe. It was terrifying to feel trapped in someone else's grip, knowing they didn't care how much it hurt.

The emotional pressure was just as heavy. Every day felt like walking through a minefield, never knowing what would set someone off. The staff's words stayed with me long after the moments passed. They made me question my worth, my identity, and whether I deserved any kindness at all. It's hard to explain how damaging it is when the people responsible for your care treat you like a burden.

The other pupils weren't always safe to be around either. Some of them lashed out physically, and I became a target more than once. When I tried to defend myself, I was the one who got punished. It didn't matter what actually happened; the staff had already decided who they believed and who they didn't. That imbalance made me feel even more powerless. It was like the rules were designed to keep me silent.

What made everything worse was the environment itself. Ladyfield didn't feel like a place for support or rehabilitation. It felt like a place where vulnerable young people were left exposed to adults who shouldn't have been anywhere near them. The atmosphere was unsafe in ways that went beyond the day to day mistreatment. It felt like a breeding ground for people who wanted to take advantage of power and vulnerability. Even as a young person, I could sense that something was deeply wrong.

Looking back, I can see how much those eighteen months affected me. I learned to stay quiet, to shrink myself, to anticipate danger even when none was visible. But I also learned something else: that what happened to me was not my fault. The adults who hurt me were responsible for their actions, not me. Telling my story now is part of reclaiming the voice they tried to silence. I survived Ladyfield, and speaking the truth about it is one way I remind myself that I deserved safety, respect, and care all along.
