From the very first day I arrived there, I was regularly beaten up. It didn't stop the entire month I was there. I remember being bruised all over my body, feeling sore and frightened, and never really understanding why it was happening to me. I had no friends because I was kept isolated, and that isolation made everything feel even heavier. I felt completely alone, like I didn't matter to anyone.

I was punished with no food whenever they said I had misbehaved. Going without food made me feel weak, but it also made me feel like I wasn't worth basic care. Being locked in rooms on my own became a normal part of my days there. Those rooms felt cold and empty, and the silence made my thoughts louder. I remember sitting there for hours, feeling scared, confused, and unsure of what I had done to deserve it.

What affected me the most was the mental abuse. From the minute I went in, it felt like they wanted to break me down. The way they spoke to me, the way they treated me, and the constant fear I lived in left marks that I still carry. It wasn't just the physical pain—it was the feeling of being constantly belittled, constantly controlled, and constantly afraid. That kind of treatment stays with you long after the bruises fade.

I've never spoken to doctors about what happened. I've dealt with it all in my own head for years. Part of me didn't know how to talk about it, and another part felt like no one would understand. I learned to keep everything inside, even though it has affected me deeply. The memories come back at unexpected times, and the emotions attached to them are still strong. I've spent a long time trying to make sense of it on my own.

Looking back now, I can see how much those experiences shaped me. The fear, the loneliness, the physical and mental abuse—they didn't stay in the past. They followed me into adulthood, influencing the way I think, the way I trust, and the way I cope. Speaking about it now is difficult, but it's also a step toward acknowledging what I went through and how much strength it has taken to carry these memories on my own for so long.

Your statement for Care setting 2 continued

There was one member of staff who was an ex police officer from wales and he particular who was always physically assaulting him whenever he got the chance. The whole experience in both of the homes was very similar, very isolated, they were restrained and would end up with bruises. He would be punished with no food if he complained and would starve him and just give him milk. He is really traumatised from being there and was always on edge worried something might happen. One night he had a really sore head and the doctor hit him with a metal box that he kept all his medicine in and refused to give him any.
