During my time there, it was absolutely awful. I was there for a long time, around eight years, and those years have stayed with me in ways I still feel today. One of the hardest things to accept is that they took me away from my mum and dad for no real reason. I was young, confused, and suddenly separated from the people who made me feel safe. That alone was frightening, but what happened after made everything even worse.

The people who were supposed to look after me would hit me and slap me. There was no kindness or care — just fear. They would “restrain” me, but it wasn’t restraint in the way it should have been. When they restrained you, they would hit you, push you around, and stick their leg up your back. It was painful, humiliating, and terrifying. I remember feeling completely powerless, like there was nothing I could do to protect myself. Every time they grabbed me, I knew what was coming, and that fear stayed with me constantly.

If they weren’t happy with something, they would throw you in the cellar. Being put down there was one of the worst experiences. It was dark, cold, and isolating. As a child, being locked away like that made me feel like I had done something terribly wrong, even when I hadn’t. It felt like punishment for simply existing. I remember sitting there, scared and alone, wondering why adults who were meant to care for me were treating me like that.

The whole experience was awful, and it has had a lasting impact on my life. The physical abuse, the fear, the isolation, and the emotional neglect all shaped who I became. I grew up feeling nervous, unsure of myself, and constantly on edge. The trauma from those years didn’t just disappear when I left — it followed me into adulthood. I still carry the memories of what happened, and they have affected my mental health and the way I see the world.

No child should ever have been treated the way I was. Those eight years left scars that I am still trying to understand and heal from.

During my time there, it was an absolutely awful place. The environment was violent, frightening, and completely unsafe. They would beat us up constantly. It wasn't just me — they would beat everybody up, and I watched it happen to loads of others. Seeing that kind of violence day after day was terrifying, especially as a young person who had no way to protect myself or anyone else.

They would make us march, and if you stepped out of line even slightly, they would kick you really hard. There was no room for mistakes, no understanding, no compassion. It felt like they were waiting for any excuse to hurt us. Even something as simple as looking them in the eye could get you punched in the mouth. I remember the shock of that — how something so small could lead to such a painful and aggressive reaction. It made me constantly anxious, always trying to avoid doing anything that might set them off.

I have never suffered anything like that before in my life, and I hope I never experience anything like it again. The level of fear and unpredictability was overwhelming. Every day felt like a battle to get through without being hurt. Some of the things I saw still stay with me now. The way they treated us, the way they used violence as a normal part of daily life — those memories don't just disappear. They come back to me sometimes, and I still think about the things I witnessed and the things that were done to us.

Being in that place changed me. It made me more nervous, more guarded, and more aware of how unsafe the world can feel when the people in charge abuse their power. No child should ever have been put in that situation. The physical and emotional impact of what I went through has stayed with me, and it's something I still carry with me today.
