Woodside stole pieces of me I never got back. I was already broken, already hurting, already a child who had learned that the adults around her could not be trusted to keep her safe. But I told myself I could survive it. I told myself I was still standing. And then they sent me to the Good Shepherd Centre—and whatever was left of me, whatever tiny flicker of the girl I was supposed to become, was extinguished.

I was 12 years old. Twelve years old. I cannot say that enough. I was a baby. I was somebody's child. I should have been worrying about school, about friends, about the small and beautiful trivialities of growing up. Instead, I was being sexually abused. A boy at that home did things to my body that I had no words for, no understanding of, no way to process. I lay there and I did not even know what was happening to me. I did not know that what he was doing was wrong. I did not know it was abuse. I did not know it had a name.

And that ignorance—that heartbreaking, devastating innocence—is something I grieve every single day. Because I couldn't cry out for help when I didn't know I needed it. I couldn't tell anyone because I had no language for what had been done to me. I was left alone with something monstrous living inside me, and I didn't even know it was there.

I think about that little girl constantly. I think about how frightened she must have been without even understanding her own fear. I think about how she deserved someone to wrap their arms around her and tell her she was safe. She was never safe. Not once. Not in any of those places that were supposed to care for her.

Nobody saved her. Nobody even looked.

And she has spent every year since trying to survive what was done to her in silence.

At the Good Shepherd Centre, they destroyed me. Piece by piece, they tore me apart. The mental torture was relentless—it didn't just hurt; it invaded every corner of my mind, poisoning my thoughts, convincing me I was worthless, that I deserved what was happening to me. I believed them. God help me, I believed them.

And then came the physical violence. Fists. Hands. The shock of pain from people I'd been taught to obey, to trust. They'd smile at me one moment and strike the next. I learned to flinch before they even touched me. My body became a prison within a prison.

But the sexual abuse—that was the cruelest theft of all. They took something sacred from me. They took my safety, my dignity, my childhood. They took pieces of my soul I'll never get back. And I was so small. So utterly powerless. I couldn't say no. I couldn't fight back. I could only endure.

She was so young. So desperate. The abuse had hollowed her out completely, and she couldn't take it anymore. She couldn't take us anymore. I watched her climb to that window. I watched her step forward. I watched her fall. The sound—I hear it still. In my nightmares. When I'm alone. When I should feel safe but I never do. That moment replays in my head like a wound that won't close. It's carved into me. It's part of me now. The guilt consumes me—why couldn't I save her? Why did she have to die while I'm still here, still breaking?

The staff were monsters wearing human faces. They hunted us like we were animals. They violated us methodically, systematically, like we meant nothing. Like we were nothing. We were children—terrified, abandoned children with no one to believe us, no one to protect us, no one to love us. We were trapped in hell, and the people who were supposed to be our salvation were our demons.

I'm still screaming inside. I'm still that scared child, still trapped in that place, still waiting for someone—anyone—to save me.

I don't know how to survive this anymore.
