I spent around four years in Alva House, and looking back, it was an experience that left a deep emotional mark on me. The staff would often shout at us, and it felt like any small thing they didn't like about how I was behaving could lead to a restraint. Those restraints were painful. They would force my hands so far up my back that the pain would last for days. When they were trying to restrain me, they would sometimes sit on top of me with their full weight, and I remember struggling to breathe underneath them. It wasn't just something that happened once or twice — it was something that happened to all of us, and it became something I lived in fear of. What made it even more frightening was that these things often happened when I was alone in my bedroom. Being isolated like that made me feel completely powerless. There was no one to see what was happening, no one to step in, and no one to protect me. The physical pain was one thing, but the fear and helplessness that came with it stayed with me long after each incident.

Alongside the physical abuse, there was a lot of verbal abuse as well. Staff would shout at us constantly, and the way they spoke to me made me feel small, unwanted, and like I didn't matter. There were times when they locked me in my room, and being shut away like that made me feel trapped and alone. It was confusing and overwhelming, especially because I was still so young and didn't understand why adults who were supposed to care for us were treating us this way.

Living in that environment for so long affected how I saw myself and how safe I felt in the world. I remember waking up each day not knowing what mood the staff would be in or what might set them off. It created a constant sense of anxiety, like I had to be on edge all the time. Even now, thinking back on it brings up a mix of sadness, anger, and disbelief that children were treated like that.
