When I think back to my earliest years, the memories that should have been filled with safety and comfort are instead overshadowed by fear. I was only five years old when I went into foster care, far too young to understand why my life felt so different from other children's. The woman who fostered me was supposed to care for me, but instead she became the source of some of my earliest pain. She would hit me and kick me, and no matter how much I tried to get away, she wouldn't stop. I remember trying to protect myself the best I could, but I was so small. Her anger always felt bigger than me. She spoke to me with such rudeness and hostility that I started to believe I was the problem. Whenever I reacted out of fear, she only became worse. At that age, I didn't have the words to explain what was happening—I just knew it hurt, inside and out.

When I was moved to 193–195 Girdleness Road, I hoped things would finally change. I hoped someone would see me, understand me, and treat me with kindness. But the pattern continued. I was a hyper child—full of energy, easily excited, always moving—and instead of helping me manage that energy, the adults around me punished me for it. I would get slapped for giving “cheek,” even when I was just being myself. It felt like everything I did was wrong in their eyes.

The first woman in charge there didn’t hesitate to hit me. When she was replaced, I thought maybe things would improve, but the new woman treated me just as harshly. She would strike me with a wooden spoon, and I learned quickly to brace myself whenever she was angry. After her came another woman, and she didn’t hit me the same way, but she would throw things at me instead. Each adult had their own way of showing their frustration, and I was always the target.

Living there taught me to be constantly alert. I never knew what version of an adult I would get on any given day. I learned to shrink myself, to quiet my natural energy, to avoid drawing attention. But even then, it never seemed to be enough. The message I received over and over was that my behaviour—my personality, even—was something to be punished.

Looking back now, I can see how deeply unfair it all was. I was a child who needed guidance, patience, and understanding, not violence or humiliation. The adults who were supposed to protect me instead made me feel unsafe in the very places meant to shelter me. Those experiences shaped me in ways I’m still learning to understand, but they also taught me something important: none of it was my fault. I was a child trying to survive in environments that failed me.

Telling my story now is part of reclaiming the voice I didn’t have back then. It’s a reminder that I deserved care, compassion, and safety—and that every child does.
