During my time in this home, something happened to me that I have carried in silence for a very long time. I was sexually abused by an older child in the home. I never told anyone. I was ashamed — deeply, painfully ashamed — in the way that only a child who has been violated and has no framework to understand it can be. That shame became something I wore silently, alone, for years. It settled into me and became part of how I saw myself, and it has taken an enormous amount of time and effort to begin to unpick that.

In the years that followed, I went through counselling for around ten years in an attempt to begin processing what had happened to me. Even within that space, the shame never fully left me. It clung to me in a way that was very difficult to shake. Unable to cope with what I was carrying inside, I began self-medicating with drugs and alcohol — mainly cannabis — from the age of just 13 years old. I was a child, reaching for anything that might dull the pain or silence the memories, even for a short while. That is not the behaviour of someone making poor choices freely — it is the behaviour of a child who was suffering and had been given no adequate support or safety.

The impact of the abuse and everything surrounding it has shown itself in my behaviour and relationships throughout my life. I am always on guard — with everyone, in every situation. I find it very difficult to relax, to trust, to feel safe around other people. I am always waiting for something to go wrong, always braced for the next hurt. That hypervigilance is exhausting to live with, and it has affected my relationships deeply. I also struggle with anger — I find myself shouting at people, reacting in ways that I know are connected to the pain and fear I have never been able to fully release.

The staff in this home were also aggressive towards me. They would restrain me and lock me in rooms, and the effect of being treated that way — of being physically overpowered and isolated as a form of control — pushed me to a place of such despair that I began to self-harm. I was hurting myself because I had no other outlet for what I was feeling and no one around me who was responding to my pain with anything other than force and punishment.

I was then fostered by a family, and I want to be clear that this too was not the safe haven it should have been. That family abused me until I was around 8 years old. Once again, a placement that was supposed to provide me with love and stability became another source of harm. When the fostering ended, I was returned to the home.

When I went back, the home I had previously been in burnt down, and all of the children were moved to another building just down the road — a Salvation Army building on Calvindale Road. The same children were placed there together. But the change of building brought no change in what I experienced. In this home I was badly bullied, and the abuse I suffered was wide-ranging and devastating. I was physically abused, mentally abused, and sexually abused. I was belittled constantly — made to feel small, worthless, and invisible. I was ignored in a way that, in its own quiet way, was its own form of cruelty. Because sometimes being overlooked and dismissed when you are a child desperately in need of care and attention leaves a mark just as deep as the more visible forms of abuse.

Every placement, every home, every family that was supposed to represent a fresh start became another chapter in the same painful story. I was a child who needed to be protected, valued, and heard. Instead I was harmed, over and over again, in more ways than I can always find the words for. And I have spent much of my adult life trying to understand and survive what was done to me during those years.
