I remember entering Mabel Residential School in Ayrshire feeling frightened and already unwell. I had polio, and instead of receiving care or understanding, I was met with ridicule and cruelty. When I wet the bed out of fear and illness, the staff didn't comfort me or try to help. They laughed at me, told others about it, and made me feel ashamed of something I couldn't control. I had Crohn's disease, yet they forced me to eat food that made me sick, ignoring everything I tried to explain about my condition. Even my faith became something they used against me. As a Protestant, I didn't believe in attending chapel the way they demanded, but they forced me to go anyway, punishing me if I resisted. The days were filled with being hit, kicked, and called names, and I learned quickly that showing fear only made things worse.

When I was moved to Castle Toward Residential School in Dunoon, Argyll and Bute, the abuse didn't stop—it intensified. My illness and bedwetting were used against me constantly. Instead of support, I was mocked and targeted. Every day felt like a battle I couldn't win. The worst moments were the showers. Because I wet the bed, they insisted I shower daily, but a man would stand and watch while I washed. I knew it wasn't right. I knew it shouldn't have been happening. But I was a child, alone, and too scared to speak up. The humiliation stayed with me long after the water stopped running.

The physical abuse was constant—being hit, pushed, or kicked for reasons that never made sense. The names they called me chipped away at whatever confidence I had left. I felt like I didn't matter, like I was there to be punished rather than cared for. Every day I carried the weight of fear, shame, and confusion, wondering why the adults who were supposed to protect me chose instead to hurt me.

Looking back, I can see how wrong it all was. No child should ever be treated that way. No illness, no fear, no difference in belief should ever be used as an excuse to harm someone. What happened to me should never have happened to anyone.
