When I was living with my foster parent, Molly Verral, I thought I finally had some sense of stability. Life wasn't perfect, but I felt like I understood where I stood and who was responsible for me. That made it even more confusing when I was suddenly taken from her care and placed with another family. No one explained who they were, why I was being moved, or what was supposed to happen next. I was just expected to accept it, as if I didn't deserve to know anything about my own life.

The family I was moved to turned out to be nothing like what I needed. The environment was harsh, unkind, and frightening. I experienced treatment that no child should ever have to face. I remember feeling completely alone, as if I had been dropped into a place where my voice didn't matter and my safety wasn't a priority. I kept wondering why I had been sent there, why no one had checked whether it was the right place for me, and why the people responsible for my wellbeing didn't seem to see what was happening.

After a while, I was moved back to Molly Verral. It was almost as sudden as the first move, and again, no one explained anything. I was just expected to carry on as if nothing had happened. But something had happened.

Something huge. I had been taken from a home I knew, placed with a family who treated me terribly, and then returned without any acknowledgement of the harm I had gone through.

What makes it even harder is knowing that none of this appears in my records. There is no trace of the move, no mention of the family, no acknowledgement of the abuse I suffered while I was there. It feels like my experience was erased, like the system decided it was easier to pretend it never happened. To me, that in itself feels like another form of abuse. I wasn't protected, I wasn't informed, and I wasn't given the truth about my own life. I should never have been moved to that family. I deserved safety, honesty, and care. Instead, I was left to deal with the consequences of decisions made without me, decisions that caused real harm. Telling this story now is my way of reclaiming what happened and refusing to let it be forgotten.
