I was constantly fighting with other kids in the children's home, and nobody—absolutely nobody—would help us. We were screaming, bleeding, begging for someone to see us, to save us, and the staff just stood there like we didn't matter. Like we were disposable. We were children who had already been ripped apart by life, and they let us destroy each other while they watched. We needed someone to hold us, to tell us we mattered, to stop the pain—and instead they let us drown in it.

One staff member fell pregnant to a friend I was living with at the time—he was only 15 years old. Fifteen. Just a boy. A broken, vulnerable child who should have been protected, and instead he was preyed upon by someone in a position of power. Someone he was supposed to trust. I watched it happen. I lived alongside him while he was being abused, and nobody stopped it. The guilt eats away at me. The horror of it never leaves. He was just a kid, and they stole his childhood, his innocence, his future.

The staff used to place bets on us when we'd fight each other. They gambled on our pain. They laughed while we tore each other apart, while we bled and cried and lost pieces of ourselves we'll never get back. We were traumatized, terrified children acting out the only way we knew how, and to them it was entertainment. We were nothing but a game to them.

Now I'm destroyed. Every single day is a battle I don't know if I can win. The mental health issues consume me, swallow me whole. The anxiety is suffocating—I can't breathe, I can't think, I can't escape it. The PTSD drags me back to that place, to those moments, and I relive the terror, the abandonment, the absolute betrayal over and over and over again. I've sat in front of psychiatrists trying to explain the unexplainable, trying to make them understand what it's like to have your soul broken by the people who were supposed to keep it safe.

We were just children. Innocent, helpless children who had already survived so much. We deserved to be loved. We deserved to be protected. We deserved to be seen as human beings. Instead, we were treated like we were worthless, like our suffering meant nothing. They failed us in every possible way, and now I have to live with the scars they left behind. The wounds that will never fully heal. The pain that never truly goes away.
