You can do this in any order that makes sense to you.

There are pages for 4 care settings included in this form. If you need more copies, you can:

- contact a case worker

I was at Liberton Remand Centre for about three months. I don't remember a great deal from my time there, but I do recall a general sense of uncertainty and not really understanding what was happening around me. After that, I was moved to Wellington Farm School, where I stayed for around another three months. My memories from there are clearer, and unfortunately they include some very difficult experiences.

At Wellington Farm School, staff used to hit me regularly. They would kick me, punch me, and beat me until I was left black and blue. They always said it was punishment for being naughty, as if that explained or justified their actions. I remember being singled out, shouted at, and then hit again. It became something I expected rather than something that surprised me. I also witnessed other people being hit, which made it obvious that this wasn't an isolated incident. It was something that happened often, almost as part of the routine. Even though I tried to get on with things, the constant threat of violence was always there in the background.

There were also cases of sexual assault. When I was in the shower, staff would sometimes throw me in without warning. They would scrub me roughly and touch me in ways that were not appropriate. At the time, I didn't fully understand everything, but I knew it made me feel uncomfortable and exposed. It was clear that what they were doing wasn't about care or hygiene. These experiences have stayed with me. Even though I try to focus on the facts when I talk about it, there is still an emotional impact. The violence and the inappropriate touching were not isolated events—they were part of the environment I was living in. Looking back, I can see that none of it was acceptable, and it should never have happened to me or to anyone else.
