My time in this care home was one of prolonged mistreatment and suffering that affected me in ways I still feel today. From the outset it was clear that this was not a place of care — it was a place where vulnerable children were treated badly by the very people who were supposed to be looking after them, and I was one of those children.

One of the most disturbing aspects of my time there was being inappropriately touched by a male member of staff. That violation — being touched in a way that was wrong and that I had no power to stop — is something that has never left me. It reached into a part of me that no person in a position of authority should ever have been permitted to reach, and the fact that it was carried out by someone who was trusted with my care made it all the more damaging and all the more difficult to process.

The man I remember most clearly was known as the Duke. He was one of the staff members who hit me regularly and with force — using batons to do so. He was not alone in this. There were around three members of staff who treated us badly, and the Duke was among the worst of them. Being struck with a baton is not a minor thing. It is a brutal and terrifying experience, and the fact that it was happening at the hands of people who were supposed to be caring for me made it feel all the more violating and all the more hopeless.

The staff knew exactly what they were doing. This was not accidental or occasional — it was deliberate, and it was inflicted on all of us in that home. We were children, and they chose to treat us that way.

The control and punishment extended to the most basic aspects of daily life. If I did not complete my work, I would be starved. Food — something every child has a right to — was used as a weapon, withheld as a punishment to keep us compliant and fearful. I was also isolated by the staff and prevented from doing anything at all within the home. That isolation, that stripping away of any form of freedom or normality, had a deep impact on me. It made me feel less than human — confined and controlled in a way that no child should ever experience.

When the pain and the fear became too much to bear, I ran away. But there was nowhere to go. When I escaped, I found myself surrounded by nothing but open fields — no town, no people, no safety, no refuge. There was quite literally nowhere I could run to. And so inevitably the staff would find me and bring me back, returning me to the very place I had been desperate to escape from. Each time I was brought back, I was locked in a room as punishment. Running away had not been a choice made lightly — it had been a desperate attempt to find some relief from what I was enduring. And each time I was caught and returned and locked away, that desperation deepened into something darker and harder to carry.

What has always stayed with me about this home is the knowledge that the staff were fully aware of what they were doing. This was not a case of individuals losing their temper or making mistakes in isolated moments. They knew. They acted with deliberateness and with impunity, and they did so to all of us. We were children in their care, entirely dependent on them, entirely without power — and they exploited that in every way they could.

The mistreatment I suffered in this home — the touching, the beatings, the starvation, the isolation, the locking away — all of it piled on top of everything else I had already been through and deepened the damage that had already been done. I left that place carrying wounds that nobody could see, but that have shaped every part of my life since. And I believe it is important that what happened there is acknowledged, recorded, and never minimised — because it was real, it was serious, and it should never have been allowed to happen to any child.
