When I moved in with Barbara and Tony Sadler, my foster parents at the time, I was only a child trying to settle into yet another new environment. From the very beginning, daily life felt wrong. Every morning, money would come in for clothes that were meant for me, but instead of buying me proper things, Barbara would take me to charity shops and pick out whatever she felt like. It wasn't about the clothes themselves—it was the message that I wasn't worth the care or effort that other children received.

Meals became something I learned to fear. If I didn't finish my dinner, Barbara wouldn't just tell me off; she would tip the entire plate over me. It happened more than once. I remember one day walking all the way to my dad's house with spaghetti bolognese dripping down my head and clothes, feeling humiliated and confused, wondering what I had done to deserve that kind of treatment. No child should ever have to carry that kind of shame

When I moved to Glenrothes, to Rimpleton House, I was thirteen. I thought things might finally get better, but instead I met a staff member named Graham who made everything worse. He would lock me in a freezing cold cloakroom for hours at a time. If I needed the toilet, he would stand in the room watching me, even though there was absolutely no reason for him to be there. I was a child, and he was supposed to be a professional. Instead, he used his position to intimidate and control me. Sometimes I would be left in that room for nine hours without food. Before the day staff arrived, he would put me back in my bed so no one would know what he had done. It made me feel invisible, like the truth didn't matter because no one would believe me anyway.

At fifteen, I moved again—this time to Redgorton House School in Perth. I stayed there for about a year, and although the abuse looked different, it still left its mark. The staff, especially some of the women, would manipulate us emotionally. They would deliberately provoke us, doing things to make us scream or react so they could justify whatever consequences they wanted to hand out. It felt like they enjoyed having that power, like our distress was entertainment or a tool they could use. Living there meant constantly being on edge, never knowing when someone would decide to push you just to see how you'd respond.

Looking back, each place I lived should have been somewhere safe—somewhere supportive. Instead, I was met with humiliation, neglect, intimidation, and emotional manipulation. These experiences didn't just happen in passing; they shaped the way I saw myself and the world around me. No child should ever have to endure what I went through, and speaking about it now is my way of reclaiming the voice that so many adults tried to silence.
