I was a child. Just a child.

I didn't choose to be in those homes. I didn't choose any of it. I was placed there because the world had already let me down once — and then it let me down again, in ways I couldn't have imagined, in ways I still struggle to put into words even now.

I watched children being abused. Children who were scared and small and had nobody to run to.

I watched it happen and I felt every single moment of it in my own body — the helplessness, the shame of not being able to stop it, the confusion of being somewhere that was supposed to be a home but felt more like somewhere you simply tried to survive. I was a child witnessing things that would break a grown adult. And there was nobody coming to help. Nobody blowing a whistle. Nobody wrapping their arms around us and telling us we were safe. Because we weren't safe.

Staff came in drunk. Adults who were supposed to be our caregivers, our protectors, the ones who tucked us in and made sure we were okay — they stumbled through the door reeking of alcohol, eyes glazed, completely unfit to be anywhere near a vulnerable child. And we just had to accept it. We had no choice. We had nowhere else to go. That was our reality.

And then one night — one ordinary, heartbreaking night — I went to get my medication. That was all. I wasn't causing trouble. I wasn't doing anything wrong. I was a child trying to take care of myself in the only small way I could. And a staff member attacked me.

I have never forgotten that moment. The shock of it. The betrayal of it. The way it confirmed every fear I had ever had — that I was not protected, that I did not matter, that the people in charge of my life could hurt me and there would be no consequences. Something broke in me that night that I have spent years trying to piece back together.

I carried all of that out of those homes and into my life, and the weight of it has been immense. Some days it is suffocating.

I live with anxiety that never fully switches off — a constant hum of dread, an alertness that exhausts me, a part of me always waiting for something to go wrong because for so long, things always did.

I live with depression that wraps itself around me like a fog, that steals colour from days that should feel okay, that whispers to me that I am too broken, too damaged, too much. And I live with a deep, aching inability to trust — to really trust — another human being. When the adults who were supposed to keep you safe are the ones who hurt you, trust doesn't come naturally anymore. It feels like handing someone a weapon and hoping they won't use it.

I grieve the childhood I deserved and never had. I grieve the little version of me who just needed someone to show up. I grieve all the years I have lost to the aftermath of what was done to me and what I witnessed.

I was let down by every adult who was supposed to protect me. I was let down by a system that placed me in harm's way and looked the other way.

But I am still here.

And what happened to me was real. It mattered. I mattered then, even when nobody showed me that I did.

And I matter now.
