I moved into Gryffe Castle, the children's home on Kilmacolm Road in Bridge of Weir, at a time in my life when I already felt vulnerable. I didn't expect luxury or comfort, but I did expect safety. Instead, what I found there was a kind of cruelty that shaped the way I saw myself for years. I had been born with a few fingers missing, something that had always made me a little self-conscious, but I never imagined it would become a target for daily humiliation. From the moment I arrived, some of the staff treated my difference as something to mock, as if it gave them permission to treat me as less than human.

They would make fun of my hands openly, laughing at me in front of others, pointing out what I lacked as if it were entertainment. But the emotional cruelty quickly turned physical. There were nights when I would be kicked out of bed for no reason at all, jolted awake by a sudden blow or a shout. Sometimes they punched me around the head, quick and sharp, as if testing how much I could take. Other times they slapped me without warning, the sting of it lingering long after the moment had passed. They threw things at me—whatever was nearby—treating me like an object rather than a child in their care.

What made it worse was the way they twisted everything to make me feel as though I was the problem. If I cried, I was told I was being dramatic. If I tried to defend myself, I was told I was being difficult. They made me believe that the abuse was somehow my fault, that I deserved it because I was different. That kind of manipulation sinks deep, especially when you're young and desperate for stability.

I did try to speak up. I told my social worker what was happening, hoping that finally someone would listen, that someone would step in and protect me. But nothing changed. No one intervened. The silence that followed my report felt like another blow, a confirmation that my pain didn't matter. That lack of action made me feel even more trapped, as though the abuse was something I simply had to endure.
