I still remember what it felt like to wake up in Urquhart House in Dyce, Aberdeen. Every morning carried the same dread. Before I was even fully awake, staff would call me names, as if humiliating us was part of their routine. One staff member, Mr. Gray, stands out more than the rest. He didn't just shout—he would hit us, throw things at us, and shove us around as if we were objects instead of children. He would slap the back of my head or punch me for no reason at all. I wasn't a particularly bad child, but he singled me out along with a few others, treating us with a cruelty that still feels senseless. There was no explanation, no justification—just fear, confusion, and the constant feeling of being targeted.

When I moved to Oakbank School in Aberdeen, I hoped things would be different. Instead, the environment changed, but the mistreatment didn't. Staff there also called us names, chipping away at whatever confidence or safety we had left. Some of the women carers would stand and watch us while we showered, staring in a way that felt deeply inappropriate and violating. We were children, and they acted as though our privacy didn't matter at all. The physical abuse continued too. They would hit and kick us, sometimes waking us up by dragging us out of bed or throwing us onto the floor. If someone wet the bed, they didn't comfort them or help them—they shamed them in front of the whole school. It was humiliation used as punishment, as if embarrassment could somehow teach us something. Instead, it only taught us fear and distrust.

The people who were supposed to care for us acted in ways no carer ever should. Their behaviour wasn't strict or disciplinary—it was degrading. It left marks that weren't always visible but were just as real. I wasn't a bad kid. I didn't deserve to be treated like that. None of us did.

Looking back, I can see how wrong it all was. At the time, I didn't have the words for it. I just knew it hurt, and I knew it wasn't how children should be treated. Those experiences shaped me in ways I'm still trying to understand, but speaking about them now is part of reclaiming my own story. What happened to me wasn't normal, and it wasn't acceptable. It was abuse, and it should never have happened.
