When I was placed into The Dale School in Arbroath, Angus, I was only there for a year, but that year left marks that stayed with me long after I left. From the very beginning, the environment felt hostile. I wasn't treated like a child who needed support—I was treated like someone they could target. The mental abuse was constant. Every day, I was spoken to in ways that chipped away at my confidence and made me feel small. They made me believe that everything was my fault, even when I hadn't done anything wrong.

But it didn't stop at words. They were physical with me, hitting me for no reason, kicking me when I was already down, and bullying me in ways that made me dread waking up each morning. I never knew when the next blow or insult would come. It created a constant sense of fear, like I had to stay alert every second just to protect myself.

Some of the worst moments were when they crossed boundaries no child should ever have to face. There were times when they touched parts of my body they had no right to touch. It left me feeling confused, ashamed, and powerless. Even showering wasn't private—someone would be watching, making me feel exposed and unsafe in a place where I should have been protected. They forced me into situations no boy should ever be put in, and then acted as though I was the one in the wrong.

They threw items at me, slapped me without warning, and treated me like I didn't matter. The combination of physical, emotional, and sexual abuse made me feel trapped inside myself. I didn't know how to speak up or who would believe me. Every time I tried to make sense of what was happening, they twisted things to make me feel guilty or responsible.

Looking back, I can see clearly that none of it was my fault. I was a child who deserved care, safety, and dignity. Instead, I was put in a place where the people responsible for my wellbeing chose to harm me. Telling this story now is a way of reclaiming the truth of what happened and reminding myself that what they did was wrong—deeply wrong—and that I never deserved any of it.
