My time at Geisland School, from ages thirteen to fifteen, left a lasting mark on me in ways I'm still trying to understand. What should have been a place of safety and learning became a source of fear, confusion, and deep emotional pain. The teachers who were meant to guide and protect us instead treated us with cruelty. They physically and verbally abused me and many of the other pupils. It wasn't the occasional harsh word or a moment of frustration—it was constant, targeted, and completely unjustified. They would hit, punch, and kick us, often for no reason at all. These weren't minor incidents; they were frightening and painful, and they made me feel powerless and unsafe every single day.

The verbal abuse was just as damaging. They screamed in our faces, singled us out, and humiliated us in front of our peers. Even when I wasn't doing anything wrong, I was made to feel like I was a problem, like I deserved the treatment I was getting. That kind of emotional manipulation stays with you. It made me doubt myself, question my worth, and feel constantly on edge.

The worst moment, the one that still haunts me, was being sexually assaulted by a member of staff. Even though it happened only once that I can clearly recall, the fear and shock of that experience have never fully left me. It was horrifying, violating, and deeply confusing for someone so young. I didn't have the words or the power to understand it, let alone speak up.

All of this has had a profound impact on my life. I've struggled with PTSD, carrying the weight of those years long after leaving the school. The memories, the fear, and the sense of betrayal have shaped how I see myself and the world. What happened to me at Geisland School wasn't just "a bad experience
