In 1997, when I was placed in foster care, I experienced both mental and physical abuse that left a lasting impact on me. At a very young age, I witnessed my older brother being beaten up by another foster child, and that moment has stayed with me ever since. Seeing someone I loved being hurt so violently made me feel helpless and terrified, and it shaped how I understood safety and trust in the world around me.

I wasn't just a witness to the abuse—soon, I became a target as well. The same foster child, James, turned his aggression toward me. I was subjected to physical abuse that no child should ever have to endure. The fear of what he might do next became a constant part of my daily life. I remember feeling trapped, unsure of who I could turn to, and constantly bracing myself for the next incident. It affected my confidence, my sense of security, and my ability to feel safe in a place that was supposed to protect me.

James didn't just hurt us physically; he terrorized both me and my brother Shane in ways that left deep emotional scars. His behavior created an environment filled with fear and unpredictability. Every day felt like walking on eggshells, never knowing when something would happen or how bad it might be. As a child, trying to make sense of that kind of behavior was overwhelming. I didn't have the words for it then, but I knew it wasn't normal, and I knew it was changing me.

Looking back, those experiences in foster care had a massive impact on my mental and emotional development. They shaped how I viewed myself and the world, and they introduced trauma at an age when I should have been learning trust, stability, and safety. Even now, I can recognize how those early experiences influenced my reactions, my relationships, and my understanding of what it means to feel protected.

Despite everything, acknowledging these experiences has helped me understand the strength it took to get through them. They are part of my history, but they do not define the person I am working to become.
