As soon as I arrived there, everything changed for the worse. From the very beginning, they were awful to us. One of the first things they did was take us into a classroom and tell us to write a letter home. I remember feeling overwhelmed and upset, so I wrote honestly about how I was feeling. Instead of supporting me, the teacher read my letter out loud in front of everyone and then slapped me across the face. I was then forced to sit back down and rewrite the letter, this time pretending that I was having a nice time. Even at that young age, I felt the weight of that moment — the realisation that my voice didn't matter, and that telling the truth would only lead to punishment. Mornings were some of the worst times. The janitor would come in while I was showering, and I felt completely exposed and powerless. He would also watch me when I was on the toilet, and even look up my skirt. I didn't understand why this was happening, only that it made me feel deeply uncomfortable, frightened, and ashamed. I carried that fear with me every day.

The physical abuse was constant. It wasn't just directed at me — it happened to many of us, and I witnessed it regularly. It became a normal part of life there, even though it should never have been. They would call us names, belittle us, and mentally and verbally break us down. The atmosphere was one of fear and control, and we learned quickly that speaking up or even reacting could lead to being slapped or punched. I remember feeling trapped, as though there was no safe space and no adult I could trust.

These experiences have had a massive and lasting effect on me. The emotional impact didn't end when I left; it followed me into adulthood. The constant fear, the humiliation, and the sense of being powerless shaped the way I saw myself and the world around me. Even now, I still feel the echoes of what happened — the anxiety, the mistrust, and the memories that surface when I least expect them. What I went through there has stayed with me, and it continues to affect me mentally to this day.
