I was still a child when I was moved to Calder Grove Children's Home in Edinburgh, and I remember arriving with a strange mix of fear and hope. I thought maybe this place would finally be somewhere I could feel safe. Instead, it became the setting for some of the darkest experiences of my life. The people who were meant to care for us allowed individuals who should never have been near children to work there. The things that happened behind closed doors were wrong, violating, and deeply confusing for someone my age. I didn't have the words for it then, but I know now that it was abuse. It left me feeling powerless, ashamed, and unsure of who I could trust. No child should ever have been put through what we were put through.

When I was moved again, this time to Dr Barnardo's on Greenheads Road in North Berwick, I thought maybe things would be different. And in some ways they were—no one hit me, and no one touched me in the ways I had endured before. But the harm didn't stop. It simply changed shape. The staff there used their words like weapons. They mocked me, belittled me, and chipped away at whatever confidence I had left. They made me feel small, stupid, and unwanted. It wasn't physical abuse, but the emotional damage was real. Sometimes it felt even harder to explain, because there were no bruises to point to, no marks to prove what was happening.

The bullying and name-calling became part of my daily life. I learned to shrink myself, to stay quiet, to avoid drawing attention. I carried the weight of their words long after I left. Even now, as an adult, I can still hear some of the things they said. It's strange how the mind holds on to cruelty, how it echoes years later in moments of doubt or insecurity. I've spent so much time trying to unlearn the things they made me believe about myself.

Looking back, I can see how both places failed me in different ways. Calder Grove exposed me to things no child should ever experience. Dr Barnardo's taught me to question my worth. Both shaped me, but neither defined me. I survived them. I'm still here, still trying to understand, still trying to heal. The memories haven't disappeared, and maybe they never will, but speaking about them—finally putting them into words—feels like reclaiming a part of myself that those places tried to take away.
