When I was at Chelmer Residential School, I experienced repeated abuse at the hands of both staff and other residents. I was a child placed into an environment that was supposed to protect and care for me, yet instead it became a place of fear, violence, and lasting trauma.

The staff would beat me whenever they felt like it. I was hit, slapped, and punched without reason, often for minor things or no explanation at all. There was no safeguarding, no accountability, and no sense that anyone was there to protect me. One teacher, who was a 3rd dan black belt, would physically assault me if he felt offended. He used his karate on me openly, in front of everyone, humiliating me while inflicting real physical harm. I remember feeling powerless, knowing that even adults who were meant to care for children could hurt me without consequences.

Other staff members behaved the same way. Mr Prat would hit me for no reason at all. There was no discipline or justification — just violence. None of them appeared properly trained to work with vulnerable children, and instead of helping, they abused their authority. The other residents also frequently attacked me. Many of them were clearly deeply disturbed children themselves, and the environment allowed violence to flourish unchecked. I was constantly on edge, never knowing when the next attack would come. What made it worse was the atmosphere of the place itself. It felt isolated and controlling, almost like a cult. The routines, punishments, and practices felt ritualistic and dehumanising, stripping us of our individuality and sense of safety. As a child, I did not have the language to explain it, but I knew something was deeply wrong.

The trauma from Chelmer has followed me into adulthood. I still suffer the effects to this day — flashbacks, anxiety, and emotional pain that do not simply fade with time. I have needed therapy to begin processing what happened to me there. The damage done was not just physical; it shaped how I see authority, trust, and safety. What I experienced was abuse, and it has left scars that remain with me every day
