When I arrived at Newfield Children's Home, I had no idea how quickly things would deteriorate. I was only there for a few months, but the impact of that time has stayed with me far longer. The abuse I faced was both physical and emotional. Staff would throw objects at us for no reason, as if we were inconveniences rather than young people who needed care. When they restrained me, it was done with unnecessary force. They would sit on me, hold me down, and act as though my fear or pain didn't matter. The way they spoke to us made it clear they didn't see us as individuals. We were treated like numbers, like tasks to be managed. They carried themselves as if they were superior, as if their authority gave them permission to treat us however they wanted.

Your statement for Care setting 2 continued

After Newfield, I was placed in Cardross Children's Home, hoping things might finally improve. Instead, the abuse simply took a different form. The staff there didn't always use physical force, but the mental and emotional abuse was constant. They would shout at us, scream in our faces, and tell us we were nothing. They said we would never amount to anything, that we were worthless, and that no one would ever care about us. Hearing those things day after day chips away at you. It makes you question your own value, even though deep down you know no child should ever be spoken to like that. The awful things they said weren't just insults — they were attempts to break us down, to make us feel small and powerless.

When I was moved again, this time to St Mary's Kenmure, I hoped the cycle might finally end. But the environment there was just as harmful. The staff were extremely physical, and restraints were carried out by four or five people at once. Being held down by that many adults didn't calm situations — it made everything worse. It created panic, fear, and a sense of being completely overwhelmed. The staff were often harsh and forceful, and they didn't tolerate being questioned. If you asked why something was happening or tried to stand up for yourself, they reacted with hostility. Their behaviour felt less like care and more like bullying. They seemed to take advantage of their power, using it to intimidate rather than support.

Looking back across all these placements, what stands out most is how consistently the people who were meant to protect me ended up causing harm. Each home had its own way of making me feel unsafe, unheard, and unimportant. The physical restraints, the shouting, the neglect, and the constant belittling all left marks that weren't visible but were deeply felt. No child should ever have to endure that, and none of it was my fault.

Speaking about it now is my way of reclaiming my voice. These experiences shaped me, but they do not define my worth. I survived environments that were supposed to help me, and telling the truth about what happened is part of taking back my power.
