I was still just a boy when I was placed in Rossie Reformatory in Montrose, somewhere between eleven and fourteen or fifteen. I spent three to four years there, and those years left marks on me that I didn't have the words for at the time. The staff who were supposed to guide and protect me became the people I feared most. They would lock me in a room on my own for hours, sometimes for reasons I didn't even understand. If I disagreed with them or tried to stand up for myself, they would respond with force. I remember being pinned down, knees pressed into my back, slapped on the back of the head as if I didn't matter. I wasn't a bad kid. I didn't deserve any of it, but that didn't seem to matter to them.

Your statement for Care setting 2 continued

When I was moved to Balgowan School in Dundee, I hoped things would be different. I hoped I would finally be somewhere safe. Instead, the cruelty just changed shape. The staff there didn't need to use physical force to make me feel small—they used their words. They called me names, mocked me, and put me down whenever they could. It felt like they were waiting for any chance to remind me that I didn't belong, that I wasn't worth kindness. There were times they would hit me for no reason, just because they could. They would lock me in my room without food or water, leaving me alone with nothing but my thoughts and the feeling that I had been forgotten. The neglect wasn't an accident; it was a pattern. It taught me to expect nothing from the adults around me, to brace myself for the next moment of humiliation or punishment.

Looking back now, I can see how wrong it all was. I was a child who needed support, stability, and care. Instead, I was met with cruelty, isolation, and fear. Those experiences shaped me, but they didn't define me. Speaking about them now is part of reclaiming my own story—something that was taken from me for far too long
