When I was about 12 years old, I returned home from school one day to find that my father had disappeared; he had been struggling with mental health issues and had a nervous breakdown. I didn't see him again for several years. This situation led to my placement in care, which was determined by a children's panel with Kilbirnie social services. I had already been a day student at Red Brae and was subsequently moved into a residential placement there, where I spent four years. During my time at Red Brae, I experienced physical abuse from the staff. One staff member, Peter Tuthill, in particular, would punch, kick, and slap me. He would laugh and use derogatory names while hitting me. Whenever I knew he was on shift, I was always on high alert and just wanted to escape. He was merciless and instilled fear in me. As a form of punishment, I was often thrown into ice-cold showers. If I swore or talked back to the staff, they would wash my mouth out with carbolic soap. I witnessed the staff physically abusing other boys daily. There was a young boy who was locked in a single room at night, and I could hear him crying himself to sleep, which was heartbreaking. At mealtimes, if I refused to eat something, I was forced to do so, which often led me to run away. The police would frequently catch me and return me to Red Brae. Upon my return, I would be beaten and then locked in a room. Red Brae had a culture of bullying, and I was initially bullied quite a bit at first. The staff were fully aware of the situation but chose to ignore it. When I needed to take a shower, I had to wait in line without any clothes, anticipating my turn to be washed. There were six showers available in the block, and the staff frequently monitored us. I recall instances when I was taken from my bed during the night and made to stand in the hallway in my pyjamas for extended periods. I often had visits with my family denied, and I was regularly not allowed to leave, which contributed to my frequent attempts to escape. This time apart from my siblings meant I missed out on important years together. My time in care has significantly affected my mental health and the relationships I've formed with others throughout my life.
