During my time at Ballikinrain, things were absolutely awful. I suffered mental, physical, and sexual abuse while I was there, and it has stayed with me throughout my life. What happened wasn't a one off incident or something that happened in isolation — it was repeated, and it became part of my daily reality. I was sexually abused, and I also witnessed other children being sexually assaulted. Seeing that happen to others was just as traumatic as experiencing it myself, because it showed me that none of us were safe.

The staff also physically abused us. They would beat us, grab us, and treat us with complete cruelty. There was no sense of protection or care from the adults who were supposed to look after us. Instead, they were part of the harm. They would speak to us in horrible ways, calling us names, shouting at us, and emotionally manipulating us. Their behaviour made me feel worthless and completely powerless. It was as if they enjoyed having control over us, and they used that power to hurt rather than help.

I tried to speak up. I went to the police, social services — anyone I thought might listen. But nobody did. Every time I tried to tell someone what was happening, it felt like my voice didn't matter. Being ignored made the situation even more devastating, because it meant the abuse continued and there was no one willing to step in and protect us. The feeling of being unheard and dismissed added another layer of trauma on top of everything else I was already going through.

The physical and emotional abuse I endured at Ballikinrain has had a massive impact on my mental health. It is devastating to look back and realise the things I had to endure, and the things I saw other children go through as well. No child should ever have to experience what we did. The memories of that time have stayed with me, and they have shaped how I see myself and how I cope with the world. The trauma didn't end when I left — it has followed me into adulthood, affecting my confidence, my relationships, and my overall wellbeing.

Ballikinrain was supposed to be a place of safety, but instead it became one of the most damaging experiences of my life. The abuse, the neglect, and the complete lack of protection have left scars that I am still trying to heal from today.

During my time at Kerelaw, things were just as bad as Ballikinrain, but in many ways it was even worse. The abuse there was constant, severe, and completely overwhelming. The staff didn't just physically hurt us — they would beat us to the point where we were terrified for our lives. The violence was extreme, and it felt like there was no escape from it. Every day brought a new fear, a new attack, or a new humiliation.

They would throw us into cold baths as a form of punishment, and they made us do things that were degrading and cruel. I remember being forced to eat food out of the bins, and the shame and disgust I felt in those moments has stayed with me. The staff seemed to take pleasure in breaking us down, both physically and emotionally. They would wrap covers around us before beating us so that the bruises wouldn't show. It was calculated, deliberate, and deeply traumatic.

I was sexually assaulted multiple times while I was there. It wasn't something that happened once — it happened repeatedly, and each time left me feeling more powerless and more disconnected from myself. I was also beaten many times, to the point where I didn't even know how to process what was happening anymore. The things we were put through were absolutely horrific, and no child should ever have to experience anything like it.

What makes it even harder to accept is that only two people from Kerelaw were ever arrested. The rest of the staff who were involved in the abuse have been able to walk free, despite everything they did to us. Knowing that they faced no real consequences adds another layer of pain, because it feels like our suffering was ignored or dismissed. It feels like justice was never served.

The abuse at Kerelaw has had a massive impact on my mental health. The physical violence, the sexual assaults, the humiliation, and the constant fear have stayed with me throughout my life. It has affected how I see myself, how I trust others, and how I cope with difficult situations. The trauma didn't end when I left — it followed me into adulthood, shaping my thoughts, my emotions, and my sense of safety.

Kerelaw was supposed to be a place where I was cared for and protected, but instead it became one of the darkest and most damaging experiences of my life. The things that happened there will always be part of my story, and I am still trying to heal from the impact of what I went through.
