When I was in childcare, I was just a tiny, defenseless child who desperately needed love, safety, and protection. I used to wet the bed—something I couldn't control, something so many young children struggle with—and instead of receiving the gentleness and understanding I so desperately needed, I was violently attacked by the very staff members who were supposed to care for me, who were supposed to make me feel safe. They would forcefully drag my small, trembling body into freezing cold baths as punishment.

I was absolutely terrified, my heart pounding with fear, my body shaking uncontrollably from both the icy water and the sheer terror of being hurt by adults I was supposed to trust. I didn't understand why they were doing this to me. I was just a child. I was so small, so powerless, so alone. I also witnessed other innocent, helpless children being physically attacked and abused right before my eyes.

I can still hear their cries, still see the fear in their faces, still feel the crushing weight of being unable to help them or comfort them. I felt utterly helpless, heartbroken, and guilt-ridden watching them suffer, knowing that we were all trapped in this nightmare together with no one to save us. Those haunting images are burned into my memory forever—they visit me in my darkest moments and won't let me go.

I suffer deeply and profoundly from anxiety, PTSD, and severe mental health struggles that consume me daily because of the unspeakable trauma inflicted upon me during those tender, formative years when I should have been learning that the world was safe and that people could be kind. Instead, I learned fear. The emotional and psychological scars run impossibly deep, poisoning every aspect of my life, every relationship, every quiet moment. I don't trust many people at all—I can barely trust anyone—because my childhood brutally taught me that even those who are meant to protect you, who society entrusts with your care, can hurt you in the most devastating and unforgivable ways. The trauma has never left me for a single day—it lives inside me constantly, like a wound that never heals, making it feel impossible to let anyone truly close or to ever feel genuinely safe in this world. I carry this pain with me everywhere I go, and some days, the weight of it feels unbearable.
