During the time this happened, I was only about two years old. I can't remember much from that age, but there is one thing I have always known — I fell into a fire and burnt my hand. Even now, at 66 years old, I still have a small burn mark on my hand. It has faded over the years, but it has never disappeared completely. That scar has stayed with me my whole life, and to me it is a clear sign of the neglect I experienced at the time.

Being only two years old, I should never have been anywhere near a fire. A child that young needs constant supervision and protection, especially around something so dangerous. The fact that I was able to fall into a fire shows just how little care or attention I was being given. , the scar has always been there, reminding me of what happened and what should have been prevented.As I got older and understood more about safety and responsibility, it became even clearer to me that I had been let down. A two year old relies completely on the adults around them, and in my case, that trust wasn't met with the protection I needed.The fact that the burn is still visible after all these years shows how serious it must have been at the time.

Looking back now, I can see how important it is for children to be properly supervised and protected. What happened to me should never happen to any child. That small burn mark has stayed with me for more than six decades, and it will always be a reminder of the neglect I experienced at just two years old.
