I remember being placed in Weedingshall Children's Home and feeling as if the world had suddenly shrunk to the size of a single room. They would lock me in there for hours, sometimes for reasons I didn't even understand. I'd sit on the bed, staring at the same four walls, wondering what I had done wrong. When staff came in, it wasn't to comfort or support me. They would smack me on the back of the head or snap at me, trying to provoke a reaction. It felt like they were waiting for me to break, and when I tried to speak up or ask for help, it was as if my voice didn't matter. I learned quickly that showing emotion only made things worse, so I kept everything inside. I felt invisible, unheard, and completely alone.

When I moved to Ballikinrain School, I hoped things would be different. I hoped someone would finally see me as a young person who needed care, not punishment. But the same patterns followed me. Staff would hit us, sometimes without warning, sometimes without any explanation at all. Their words could sting just as much as their actions. They would tell us we were nothing, that we wouldn't become anything, that we didn't deserve better. Hearing that day after day started to sink into me. I was just a kid, trying to make sense of the world, and the people who were supposed to guide me were the ones tearing me down.

There were days when the fear sat so heavy in my chest that I felt like I couldn't breathe. I would watch the staff walk past and tense up, waiting for something to happen. Even when nothing did, the worry never left. I didn't understand why adults—people who were meant to protect us—chose to treat us like that. I kept wondering if maybe they were right, if maybe I really was nothing. It's hard to grow when every message you hear tells you that you don't matter.

But even in the middle of all that, there were small moments when I held on to myself. Times when I reminded myself quietly that what they were saying wasn't the truth. Times when I imagined a future where I wasn't trapped in those places, where I could make my own choices and be around people who actually cared. Those thoughts kept me going, even when everything around me felt dark.

Looking back now, I can see how wrong it all was. No child should ever be treated that way. No one should be made to feel worthless or afraid in a place that's supposed to keep them safe. What happened to me wasn't my fault, and it wasn't something I deserved. It shaped me, yes, but it didn't define me. I survived it, and I'm still here, still growing, still finding my voice after years of being silenced.
