During my time there, I experienced a great deal of abuse. A lot of it was mental and emotional. Staff would call me names, shout at me, and speak to me in ways that made me feel worthless. The constant shouting created an atmosphere of fear, and the name calling slowly chipped away at my confidence. I learned to expect humiliation on a daily basis, and it made me feel like I didn't have any value or protection.

There was also sexual assault. One of the staff members used to come into the room at night and sexually assault me. At the time, I didn't fully understand why it was happening or why no one stopped it, but I knew it made me feel scared, confused, and completely powerless. When I eventually spoke with friends who were also living there, they told me they were being assaulted as well. Hearing that confirmed that it wasn't just me—it was something happening to others too, and that made the whole situation feel even more frightening and isolating. It felt like there was no safe place and no adult we could trust.

The physical abuse was another constant part of life there. Staff would hit us regularly. They claimed they were "restraining" us, but it wasn't restraint—it was violence. I was hit, grabbed, and thrown around. They would punch me in the ribs and use force that had nothing to do with keeping anyone safe. It felt like they used any excuse to hurt us, and I never knew when it was going to happen. Living in that kind of environment meant always being on edge, always bracing for the next blow or the next outburst.

All of this had a deep mental impact on me as a young person. The combination of emotional abuse, physical violence, and sexual assault left me feeling unsafe in every possible way. Eventually, it became too much, and I ran away from the home. I ended up homeless for a while, because anywhere felt safer than staying there. I had no real support, and I was just trying to survive until I was old enough to live on my own. Those experiences shaped my early life and left long lasting effects on how I see people, how I cope with stress, and how I understand trust and safety.
