I was just a little child and I was starving. Not just for food, though I was that too. One biscuit. One dry sandwich. Like my hunger didn't matter. Like I didn't matter. I used to wonder if anyone out there was thinking about me, if anyone even knew what was happening behind those walls. Nobody came.

Instead the people who were supposed to love me, supposed to protect me, supposed to be safe, they were the ones hurting me. Their hands on me. Restraining me. Hitting me. I was a child and I was being attacked by adults who held all the power and I had none. None at all.

I watched it happen to other children too. I had to stand there and watch and there was nothing I could do. We were just kids. We were just kids and nobody was coming to save us.

That room. That mattress. Just a mattress. Like we were less than human. Like we didn't deserve comfort or warmth or softness or any of the things that children are supposed to have as a basic right. And now I'm an adult and I still can't sleep in the dark. My body never forgot. My mind never forgot. Every single night I carry those children's home walls with me into my bedroom. The trauma didn't stay in the past. It followed me. It lives in me.

It shaped me into someone who finds it hard to trust a single soul, because the people who were supposed to be trustworthy destroyed something in me that has taken so long to try to rebuild. I have PTSD.

I have anxiety. I carry invisible wounds that nobody can see but that I feel every single day of my life.

And I need the world to know that what happened to me was real. It happened. It was abuse. It was wrong. And I was just a child who deserved to be held gently and fed properly and kept safe and loved. I deserved to be loved.
