When I think back to the years I spent in Tillibody Children's Unit in Clackmannanshire, from age eleven to eighteen, what stands out most isn't safety or support. It's fear. I remember walking through the corridors feeling constantly on edge, never knowing when something as simple as speaking up or even existing in the wrong moment would set someone off. The people who were supposed to care for us, guide us, and protect us often became the source of the harm.

There were staff members who would shout at us for things that didn't make sense, as if raising their voices was the only language they knew. Sometimes it escalated into physical behaviour that felt completely unjustified. I remember being pushed, kicked, or hit, not because I was a danger to anyone, but because they could. The worst moments were the restraints.

They would take me to the floor, pinning me down even when I wasn't fighting back. I can still recall the pressure on my arms, the weight on my back, and the helplessness that came with knowing there was nothing I could do to stop it.

Afterwards, I would find bruises—dark marks on my skin that lasted for days. They were reminders of moments I tried hard to forget. What made it even harder was the confusion. I was young, and part of me kept wondering if I had done something wrong, if somehow I deserved it. But deep down, I knew I didn't. No child deserves to be treated like that.

Living in that environment for seven years changed me. It taught me to stay quiet, to shrink myself, to anticipate danger even when none was there. It took away a sense of trust that should have been built during those years, not broken. Looking back now, I can see how wrong it all was. I can name it for what it was: mistreatment, abuse, and a complete failure of the people who were meant to care.

Even though those experiences shaped me, they don't define me. Speaking about it now is part of reclaiming my voice—something I wasn't allowed to have back then.
