I started at Kerelaw when I was around 13 or 14 years old, and from the very beginning it was an awful experience. My time there was marked by constant fear, intimidation, and witnessing abuse on a regular basis. I saw staff abusing children repeatedly. They would restrain us, but the restraints were not about safety — they were violent. Staff would hit young people in the back with their knees, push our faces into the ground so hard that some of us ended up with carpet burns, and twist arms in ways that caused real pain. I was scared to speak out or even be myself because it felt like anything could trigger punishment.

One day in the classroom, I witnessed something that has stayed with me ever since. A teacher beat up a pupil right in front of us. The child was left black and blue, with a badly broken nose. It was shocking, but at Kerelaw it almost felt like this kind of thing was normal. There were several occasions where I saw pupils being beaten by staff using snooker cues. I also witnessed some pupils being sexually abused by staff members. These were adults who were supposed to protect us, yet they were the ones causing the harm.

Staff would take pupils out on trips in the van, and instead of these being positive experiences, they turned them into something cruel. They made us play a game they called “hunt the cunt,” where we were forced to chase one child, and once caught, that child would be beaten up. If anyone refused to take part, the staff would beat them instead. It created an environment where violence was unavoidable, and fear was constant.

The verbal abuse was just as damaging. Staff would tell us that nobody loved us, that we were nobodies, that nobody cared about us, and that if we ever told anyone what was happening, nobody would believe us. They called us “uneducated delinquents” and made us feel worthless. When we were at home, they would take our shoes away so we couldn’t run away. I remember people running barefoot just to try to escape. All of this has had a lasting effect on me mentally.

During my time there, I was also groomed by the art teacher, Mark. He would keep me behind after class to “help with my portfolio,” but it became clear that his intentions were not professional. He took me to his home address, and during these times he touched my legs, my bum, and assaulted me. This was sexual abuse, and it has had a deep and long lasting impact on me.

The experiences I went through at Kerelaw have stayed with me throughout my life. I have never fully recovered mentally from what happened there. The fear, the violence, the manipulation, and the abuse — both what I experienced and what I witnessed — shaped me in ways I am still trying to understand. My time at Kerelaw was traumatic, and it has left scars that I continue to carry.
