You can do this in any order that makes sense to you.

When I look back on my childhood, I see a pattern of instability, fear, and neglect that no child should ever have had to endure. My time in foster care was supposed to provide safety and support, but instead it became another place where I was harmed. During that period, I was sexually abused by my brother in law, an experience that left deep emotional scars and shaped the way I understood trust and safety. I was a child, and I should have been protected. Instead, I was left vulnerable in a situation where adults failed to keep me safe.

Throughout those years, I was moved repeatedly between foster care and my mother's home. These moves were not based on what I needed, but on decisions made by doctors about whether my mother was temporarily well enough to care for me. My mother lived with paranoid schizophrenia, and although she had moments of stability, she was often unable to provide the consistent care and emotional support a child needs. Each time I was sent back, I felt like I was being placed into a situation that was unpredictable and unsafe. The constant back and forth left me feeling unsettled, confused, and unsure of where I truly belonged.

What hurts the most, looking back, is how unsupported I was by the local authority. They were responsible for my wellbeing, yet I felt overlooked and neglected. There were clear signs that I needed stability, protection, and proper care, but those needs were not met. Instead, I was moved around without consideration for the emotional impact it had on me. No one seemed to question whether the environments I was being placed in were genuinely safe or nurturing. I was left to cope with situations far beyond what any child should have to manage.

Living with a parent who struggled with severe mental illness was challenging, and I often felt like I had to take on responsibilities and emotional burdens that were not mine to carry. I didn't have the support or guidance to understand what was happening around me. Instead, I learned to adapt, to stay quiet, and to survive. The adults in charge of my care should have stepped in, offered consistent support, and ensured that I was protected. Instead, I was left feeling invisible.

These experiences shaped me in ways I am still trying to understand. They taught me resilience, but they also left me with a sense of loss—loss of safety, loss of trust, and loss of the childhood I should have had. Speaking about it now is part of reclaiming my story. It is a way of acknowledging what happened, recognising the strength it took to survive it, and refusing to let those experiences define my worth. I deserved better, and telling the truth about my past is a step toward healing and understanding the person I have become.
