I was only a child when I was sent to Dr Guthries in Edinburgh, and even though I was there for just two weeks, those days left a mark on me. The teachers who were supposed to look after me made me feel small and unwanted. They called me names, spoke to me with contempt, and treated me like I didn't matter. I remember feeling confused, wondering what I had done wrong, why adults who were meant to protect me were instead tearing me down. Even in that short time, the bullying chipped away at my confidence and made me dread every day.

When I was moved to St John Bosco's School in Aberdour, Fife, things became even worse. The adults there didn't just shout or insult me—they hurt me physically and emotionally. They hit me, kicked me, and used fear as a way to control me. They crossed boundaries no adult should ever cross with a child, and they manipulated me into believing that everything was my fault. They made me feel trapped, ashamed, and powerless. They used threats and punishment to force me into doing things I didn't want to do, and they convinced me that if I spoke up, no one would believe me.

At night, when I should have felt safe in my bed, I didn't. They would come into my room, get into my bed, and make me feel like I had no escape. They twisted everything so that I felt guilty, even though they were the ones abusing their power. I remember lying awake, terrified of the next time it would happen, terrified of the consequences if I tried to resist.

Eventually, I reached a point where I couldn't take it anymore. I ran away, desperate for freedom, desperate for someone to see what was happening. But the police brought me back, and instead of being protected, I was treated like a troublemaker. I wasn't the only one who tried to escape—many of us did—but every time, we were dragged back and made out to be liars. The adults in charge dismissed our voices, silenced our truth, and continued to harm us.

Looking back, I know now that none of it was my fault. I was a child in a system that failed me. What happened to me was wrong, and the responsibility lies entirely with the adults who abused their power.
